764 up this job. The corpse, always cremated in the early morning before sunrise, is attended by family relatives who keep watch of the fire. The corpse-watchers have to be odd in number, either seven or nine. After the ox and sheep have been cooked in the house, they are carried to the place of cremation, where all the people assemble and eat together, drinking to their full capacity. The ashes of the corpse are sometimes buried underground and sometimes scattered in the forest where there is no trace of living beings. After cremation the whole family stays outside the house and only one person can remain inside to take the pi-mu around. The door is then closed as the latter performs magic with a sieve to sift out the soul of the dead and to purify the household.

At the time of cremation, the Lolo invite the pi-mu to make a spirit tablet of the dead. This is almost like the first stage of ancestor worship. The spirit tablet is made from a wooden stick about five inches long and split into two parts with a small hollow made in the inner side of each of them. This is called the spirit house. Next, the pi-mu takes from the burial ground a small piece of bamboo, preferably a young shoot, and cuts it into a small slip. With wool sheared in March, the slip is bound with cotton thread — nine rounds for a man and seven for a woman. This bundle represents the soul and is placed inside the spirit house. Then the two pieces of split wood are put together — so that the spirit being is laid inside the hole never to be seen again — and bound on the upper outside with hemp twine, again seven rounds for a woman and nine for a man, the whole wrapped in a white cotton cloth. After the pi-mu has performed magic to remove impurities, it becomes a spirit tablet and is placed on a wooden board on the wall behind the kitchen stove. At New Year festivals and at the time of exorcism for sickness, the pi-mu performs magic and kills victims to sacrifice to the spirit, entertaining it with wine and food.

Unlike the Han-Chinese who make offerings to ancestral tablets and worship them for generations, the Lolo are permitted to remove their spirit tablets after a soul-delivery ceremony. The aim of this ceremony is to release the souls of the ancestors so that they can enter the other world. The ceremony, generally very solemn, is performed either singly by one family or [101] through the combined efforts of several families, the elaborateness or simplicity of the ritual depending upon the economic ability of the family or the clan. It is usually held a year, sometimes three or five years, after the death of their ancestor. There are cases of the ceremony
